

If I were mayor, I would use my authority prudently, as I realize what a great responsibility it is. Thus, I would do three essential actions. First, I would seek advice from knowledgeable town elders. Next, I would try to ignite a thirst for learning in children. Lastly, I would make incremental changes to our community, respecting the past work of others. These three actions demonstrate three things every town should have: an extraordinary present, a bright future, and a respected past.

Seeking wise advice is something successful authorities have done for centuries. I would ask trustworthy people with more experience and wisdom than me for advice on how to use my mayoral authority for the best. History has shown repeatedly how beneficial this practice is. Many leaders have missed advantageous opportunities due to a lack of good advice. In truth, politics do not matter as much as wisdom. Secondly, I would help create curiosity for learning in children because this will help them flourish when they are older. Many children resist learning despite its benefits. Those who love learning are more likely to go far in life. Children shape the future, and we need to make sure we help them along. Finally, I would make incremental changes instead of sweeping changes to Mediapolis. I greatly respect those who have given their time to better our community. People have worked long hours to form our town into the place it is today. Mediapolis is already a safe and overall spectacular town, which is in need of no dramatic changes.

I have lots of ideas for enhancing Mediapolis, but ultimately these three are immensely important to the town and should be considered by any mayor. Asking advice is invaluable to any person in authority, whether team captain, mayor, or president. Education is designed to help children to succeed later in life. Many kids are unaware of this fact, and I would try to fix this significant issue. Lastly, people have given their energy and time to shape Mediapolis into a wonderful town. I would honor their positive contributions. These three actions are fundamental to secure an extraordinary present, a bright future, and a respected past.
